The river of life floweth calmly now, For the tempest's rage is past; And with earmest eye on the sloudless sky, We muse on the perils so late passed by, With a marmared prayer to the Power on high That we anchor safe at last.

The rage of the pittiless storm is o'er-But also, for the wrecks that lie, With dismentled must, on the waters cast, Their sails all torn by the shivering blast; Sad, and memories of danger past I They are drifting tilly by.

From the tearful eye, from the anguished cry And the arms outstretched in valu. They are drifting away to the open sea, The measureless deep of sternity. Though long and weary our journey may be, We shall see them -ne'er again !

O'er the waveless tide we may smoothly glide; But ah ! gons, forever gons, Are the loving fips which our own have pressed, The waving hair we have oft caressed, And the forms we blessed in their peaceful rest, When the relemn night came on-

Though with carnest eye on the cloudless sky And a prayer, dear Lord, to Thee, Still our lone hearts yearn and we sadly mourn The forms beloved, from our fond clasp torn, Which the merciless waves, in the storm, have borne Far out to the open sea.
